Herniation of the ovary within the inguinal canal is well-described in infants\(^1\) or in association with genital abnormalities\(^2\), however it is considerably less common in phenotypically normal adult females. We describe an unusual case of ovarian herniation via an indirect inguinal hernia in a healthy adult female, and present a brief literature review to provide some context for this rare diagnostic consideration.

References
